	Standard Continuous Orientation opening
If you have a physical, learning, or psychological disability that makes taking college classes challenging, you should know about the Office of Student Accommodations.	Student One: Boy, I am having a rough time in class? I used to get help in high school for my disability. What am I going to do now?
The student is responsible for Self-Disclosing and setting up an appointment with the Coordinator of Student Accommodations.	Student Two: Did you know that there is an Office of Student Accommodations in One College Centre?
	[Cut to overhead view of campus, zoom into OCC Dissolve to view of door as viewed from parking then Office]
Students with a disability, who are interested in receiving services, must fill out an application and bring documentation to the Office of Student Accommodations. 	[Dissolve to shot of computer]
When you meet with the Coordinator, you and the Coordinator will discuss what information is to be given to TC faculty and staff, and set up a plan of action. Next you deliver the accommodations letter to your instructors. Next you deliver the accommodations letter to your instructor.
	Student One: That sounds sort of like cheating or that I won't learn what other students learn?
	Student Two: No, accommodations help ensure you receive the same education as other students, without discrimination.
